with facts, suggest remedies for the evils charged, and appeal to the reason of the people. Instead of that we were treated to a mere rant against the things that are, without the least suggestion of the modus operandi by which a better state of affairs is to be promoted. We speak thus plainly because good citizens can and regard him as a dangerous agitator who employs cunning and sophistry to arouse passions of hate and hatred against labor and capital. The fact is there is no country on the globe where labor is so honorably, the laborer so respected as in America. Between the interest of labor and capital there is room for real friendship, and the condition of labor is healthful and constantly improving. That such is the case is perfectly evident to any man who will take the pains to look into the question. The people are in a mood to listen to the argument, and it is just what Mr. De La Matry was careful to avoid.

A Fable for the Times.

A Goat was one day feeding in a rich meadow upon the tender grass which was just sprouting from the earth after the winter's sleep, when a sly old Fox came that way.

"My dear Friend," said the Fox, "how do you do? Do you find plenty to eat?"

"All!" replied the Goat, "what grass there is, is very good but it has hardly grown long enough to suit my taste."

"My Friend," said Reynard, "you make a mistake in lingering here when over yonder, near that high wall is a most luxuriant growth of herbage."

"I do not see it," said the Goat.

"Just see it!" exclaimed the Fox, "your eyesight must be defective. Just put on these glasses of mine and I'll warrant you'll see it quite enough." So saying, the crafty Fox adjusted a pair of immense green goggles on the nose of the silly creature.

"Oh yes; I see it very well now, said the simple creature, "how delightfully fresh and green it looks! But how shall I get over there?"

"I'll show you," said the Fox, "I know the way, and though I do not care for such food, yet I like to do a friendly act, and moreover do not wish those fat cattle yonder whom I despise, to get a single bite of it. So I'll show you the way. Come along with me."

Away went the Goat through a stretch of boggy land which seemed impassable, but the sly old Fox had been there before and knew many a short cut by which he and his simple companion could pass over it in safety.

When they reached the wall which perceived that its top was covered with vines richly loaded with bunches of luscious grapes which hung just out of reach from the ground.

"What magnificent grapes!" exclaimed the Goat, "how I should like to eat them!"

"No," replied the Fox, "you perceive by looking through these glasses that they are yet green. Content yourself at present with this abundance of rich grass and by and by the grapes will grow so large they will drop into your mouth. But now we are arrived, do you stand near the wall while I say grace."

No sooner had the sly Goat done as directed than the Fox leaped upon his back and then easily attained the top of the wall.

The Goat gazed at the grapes as he did so, the glasses fell from his nose. On looking round he saw nothing but a tangled growth of rank weeds long since withered and dried up by the burning sun, while above him in the wall was the Fox, busily snuffing himself with the grapes.

"Wretched fool that I was!" cried the poor Goat, "Why did I not reflect that the wicked Fox could have no motive in bringing me here except for his own advantage?"

The fable should teach us that the Democrats would never pretend to aid the Greenbackers in obtaining their ends unless they wished to use the latter for their own advantage.
